In Outlying Houses

SHUBERT-RIVIERA—"Maytime," with Eileen Van Biele, Henry Norman and others in the cast, will be the attraction here for a week.

BRONX OPERA HOUSE—Max Marcin will offer "The Nightcap," written by him in conjunction with Guy Bolton for a week's run. Flora Sheff and Elizabeth Rison are among those in the case.

At the Columbia

"The Bowery Burlesquers" is the title of the new burlesque which opens at the Columbia Theater to-morrow afternoon. Joe Hurtig is the producer. Billy Foster and Polly Sweet head the cast and they will have the support of Marty Simon, Justice Gray, Margaret White and Russell K. Hill. There will be vaudeville specialties and musical features besides the burlesque.

Gib Sisters Change Roles

Since Dorothy and Lillian Gib have finished work in "The Two Orphans," which D. W. Griffith is to put on the screen, they have decided to change roles for the future. Dorothy is going in for tragedy and Lillian will do comedy; in fact, she is planning a series of comedies. Dorothy is the blind orphan in the picture.

Work for Screen Is Too Mechanical For Billie Burke

There are many persons around Washington, D. C., who remember Billie Burke when she was a shy, red-headed little girl, and no one ever thought she was going to become the charming actress she now is. Now she is the star in "The Intimate Strangers" at Henry Miller's Theater.

The actress was born in Washington and spent her childhood there. Then her father, who was a famous clown, took her to Europe with him. His idea was to make a singer of her, and he had her educated with that in view. She did make her debut as a singer in the London music halls, and she was pretty enough and sang well enough to attract the attention of George Edwards, the musical comedy producer. Edwards gave her a small part in "The Runaway Girl," a piece in which another American girl, Edna May, was starring.

It so happened that in this piece there was one song about a little canoe that no one seemed to think much of and that no one really cared to sing. So it was given to Miss Burke, who being a newcomer was grateful for anything. Well, that song proved the hit of the show and Miss Burke's fortune was made.

Edwards liked Miss Burke and so did London. After "The Runaway Girl" she had a better part in "The Duchess of Danzig" and then the star part in "The Belle of Mayfair." But Miss Burke didn't want to stick to musical comedy all her life. She was ambitious to be a real comedienne, so when Charles Hawtree wanted her to play with him in a piece called "Mr. George" she consented. She played the title role, for Mr. George was really a woman. The play wasn't a success, but Miss Burke was. About that time Charles Frohman was looking for a leading woman for John Drew in "My Wife" and he engaged Miss Burke to come back home as a real actress.

She made her American debut with John Drew at the Empire Theater. The next season Mr. Frohman made her a star in "Love Watches." She played in "Mrs. Dot," a comedy by Somerset Maugham that Marie Tempest had done in London; "The Runaway," an adaptation from the French; "Suzanne," a Belgian comedy; "The Mind-the-Point Girl," a drama by Sir Arthur Wing Pinero; "The Land of Promise," a serious play by Maugham, and "Jerry," a comedy by Catherine Chisholm Cushing.

After that a tempting offer was made to her to play for the "movies" and she accepted it. She would have had to be almost more than human to have refused it. Since then she has appeared only twice on the speaking stage—with Henry Miller in "A Marriage of Convenience" and in "Cesar's Wife," another serious play by Maugham.

Some one asked Miss Burke not long ago if she liked playing for the "movies." "Well," said she, "I don't dislike it, but it doesn't satisfy me. The whole thing is too mechanical. There is none of the glamour, the romance of the stage, and there is no audience and no applause. Yes, I do like applause—every actress does."

And so she is coming back to the stage—the speaking stage—to get that applause.

Jennings Coming Again

Emil Jennings, who scored such a success in "Passion," will be seen before long in "All for a Woman," the newest foreign film, which is scheduled for production at the Strand Theater. It tells a story of the French Revolution and Jennings plays George Jacques Danton.
